The Middle East and the Eastern Mediterranean are undergoing unprecedented geopolitical transformations producing new strategic alignments in the security architecture of the region. This course taught by Dr. Micha'el Tanchum provides students with a comprehensive overview of the newly emerging trends, explaining their causes in historical context. The course will help students understand the challenges and opportunities these trends present to the European Union and particularly the EU's Mediterranean member states. The course will examine religious, political, military, and economic factors, including the geopolitics of energy and the new forms of commercial connectivity.

Taught in seven parts, the course will cover the principal actors in the current civil wars in Syria, Yemen, and Libya within the larger regional geopolitical framework. The course will also consider the impact of Islamism and Jihadism on the modern Middle East including the shift to Global Jihad with the emergence of Al-Qa'ida and ISIS as well as the Arab Spring and the new Islamist parliamentary politics. Among the topics examined in this course are: The expansion of Iranian hegemony in the region and the efforts of the Saudi/Emirati-led coalition to counter it; The Transformation of Saudi Arabia as a society and as a Middle East actor; Political developments within Turkey and Turkey's changing impact on the regional realignments; Egypt's re-emergence as a major regional power and its effect on the regional balance of power; The current state of the Maghreb nations and emerging Trends in the North Africa-Sahel Region; Russia's rising influence across the region and its affect the strategic equations of regional and world powers.
