International Relations Theory (Doble RRII/Der/His) Guía docente 2026-27

INTRODUCTION

Course Description:

International Relations (IR) is an inherently interdisciplinary field of study, drawing insights from history, political science, economics, law, sociology, and philosophy. Yet, what gives International Relations its distinctive intellectual identity is its rich body of theoretical literature. IR theory provides the conceptual foundations that enable scholars and practitioners to understand, explain, and evaluate international phenomena. For this reason, the study of IR theory occupies a central place within the discipline and is essential for anyone seeking a deeper understanding of global affairs.

In an age characterized by an unprecedented abundance of information, the challenge is no longer access to facts but rather the ability to interpret them meaningfully. Indeed, contemporary society is often described as suffering from a form of “data smog,” in which the sheer volume of information can obscure rather than clarify our understanding of the world. Theory serves as a vital tool for navigating this complexity. It offers analytical frameworks that help us identify patterns, ask meaningful questions, evaluate competing explanations, and make sense of international events.

This course provides a comprehensive introduction to the major theoretical traditions in International Relations, including Realism, Liberalism, Marxism, Constructivism, and a range of post-positivist approaches. Students will explore how these perspectives differ in their assumptions about the nature of international politics, the causes of conflict and cooperation, the role of power, identity, and ideas, and the possibilities for global change. The course will also examine emerging debates within the discipline concerning the implications of phenomena such as artificial intelligence, climate change, pandemics, and other non-human factors that increasingly shape international relations.

Throughout the course, theoretical concepts will be applied to both historical and contemporary international events, enabling students to appreciate the practical relevance of abstract ideas. By engaging with diverse and often competing perspectives, students will develop the ability to critically assess international developments and construct their own informed interpretations of world politics.

Ultimately, the course aims not only to provide students with a solid understanding of the major theories of International Relations but also to cultivate the analytical, critical-thinking, and argumentative skills necessary for academic success, professional life, and informed global citizenship.
